

U.S. District Court Rules Intellectual Ventures to Cover Certain Trend Micro Legal Fees After Failed Patent Claims

Rare Ruling Due to “Exceptional” Circumstances Results in Positive Outcome for Industry Leader

DALLAS--(BUSINESS WIRE)--In a recent ruling, the U.S. District Court of Delaware ruled Trend Micro Incorporated (TYO: 4704; TSE: 4704), a global leader in cybersecurity solutions, will be reimbursed part of its legal fees incurred during a recent patent legal dispute. This unusually positive outcome stemmed from Trend Micro’s earlier victory in 2015, when the same court confirmed the invalidity of patents asserted against Trend Micro by Intellectual Ventures (IV).

“We are pleased to see our claims confirmed by U.S. District Judge Leonard P. Stark, and are relieved this case can be behind us,” said Eva Chen, CEO for Trend Micro. “A system for protecting legitimate intellectual property rights is important to our industry, and seeing at least part of our expenses covered when that system has been abused reaffirms the importance of legitimacy in the technology space. This is an important ruling not only for Trend Micro, but also for the industry.”

Trend Micro will be requesting more than $500,000 in response to this ruling to compensate for legal fees incurred as a result of IV’s conduct. “Unfortunately, professional patent plaintiffs sometimes engage in questionable conduct that drives up the cost of litigation for the value creating companies they target and may confuse the jury into returning a bad verdict,” said Felix Sterling, Trend Micro’s Chief Legal Officer. “Judge Stark clearly wants to deter that sort of conduct, and recognizes that compensation is appropriate in the sort of exceptional circumstances we experienced in this case.”

IV initially sued Trend Micro for infringement of various claims of U.S. Patent Nos. 6,460,050 (‘050) and 6,073,142 (‘142), seeking $150 million. IV asserted two other patents, but Trend Micro was able to get the company to drop those patents because IV likely believed them to not be infringed or invalid. IV dropped one of those during the pendency of its patent ineligibility motion. The district court of Delaware declared the claims of the two remaining patents as patent-ineligible, including ‘050 and ‘142.

During the course of these proceedings, Trend Micro has been represented by a team lead by Yar R. Chaikovsky with Allan Soobert and Philip Ou of Paul Hastings LLP.
